INTRODUCTION

Chinese art has long been with us in various forms, though perhaps we have been little conscious of it as art, because it entered so unobtrusively into our daily life. The services of a fastidious fineness have been (like the aroma of tea itself) associated with English homes and the generations from which they were handed down rather than with thoughts of the sensitive skill of fingers patiently at work in the farthest of far-away countries, partly perhaps because those translucent cups and saucers with their shell-like delicacy seemed almost too perfect to be the work of human hands. Many old English houses had—some still have—Chinese wallpapers; and we may not have stopped to think how the Chinese adoration of the beauty of flowers has affected for so long the decoration of our houses, supplying a world of motives such as the artists of the Middle Ages delighted in, but which classical and Renaissance ideals have almost entirely eschewed, deploying these motives, too, with a new kind of largeness and liberality in design. Silken fabrics, again, taught us refinements of colour-harmonies before unknown. Chinese furniture gave more than a hint to English master-craftsmen like Chippendale. But it is, of course, in ceramics that Chinese inspiration has been of paramount importance; there, all Europe has sat at China's feet.

It may seem strange that the handiwork, the taste, and the fancy of designers living in a country so remote, so little known, and belonging to a civilisation which had no common origin with that of Europe, should enter into and make themselves at home in the daily life of English people. At first, no doubt, there was the charm of the exotic that attracted; but it was no transient fashion, and in the main we may believe that it was the intimate companionship with Nature, the deep love of flowers, birds and animals expressed so abundantly in Chinese art, that made the permanent appeal to us.

Yet all the while we were content to assume that this efflorescence of design, at once refined and gay, this surpassing sense for exquisite texture in materials, were the possession of a race of craftsmen content only to shape and decorate things of use; we had not the curiosity to inquire whether behind all this were not creative artists, as in Europe, whose work embodied the imaginative ideals of the race. If we had inquired, we should have found out that, for the Chinese, painting is the supreme art; and Chinese painting has a far longer tradition than that of any European country. For more than sixteen centuries there has been a continuous succession of gifted artists, and their art has been nourished on thought and religion, has expressed a philosophy of life.

Introduction

This tardy and gradual approach to a realisation of the creative power and inner genius of the Chinese, only attained in the present century, is not unfortunate in so far as we can the better appreciate, what has been so often forgotten in the West, the unity of all art. With this race there is no hard bounding-line between art and craft. A vase can have the nobility of great sculpture.

The painting is naturally a little more difficult of approach for us than the decorative design on the forms of pottery and porcelain, because it is impregnated with ideas, associations, legends and beliefs that are unfamiliar. Yet that mental world is not difficult of access if we take a little trouble. We soon come to recognise the figures of the fairyland of the Taoists, happy beings who have drunk of a magic elixir and who float at will through the air and over the seas or gather about the Fairy Queen, Hsi Wang Mu, in her Western mountain home. And, if we forbear from regarding the Buddhist figures merely as 'heathen idols', we shall find in these forms, imagined to incarnate the Infinite Power and the Infinite Compassion which respond to the suffering cry of every sentient being, the same human need and aspiration vibrating as in our own natures.

Moreover, Chinese painting consists, to a far greater degree than European painting, of landscape art and of art inspired by the life of flowers and birds and animals; and here the approach presents less obstacles. Everyone must be struck by the early emergence of landscape as an independent art—no mere background for figures—centuries before it was so conceived in the West. This is no accident; it belongs to a different conception of the universe and man's place in it; to a consciousness of the continuity of all life, so that each living thing is seen in relationship to an infinite whole, and acquires a significance from that relationship. Since Man was not regarded as the centre and hero of the universe, the nude human form never became the supreme symbol that it is in Western art.

The finest landscapes, of the Sung era especially (10th-13th centuries A.D.), with their sense of space and mastery of atmosphere, appear as if contemporary with ourselves. Some examples, it is true, may disconcert by what seems a fantastic element; but then in China the shapes of actual rock and crag have often a fantastic appearance. Some allowance must also be made for the influence of calligraphy on painting, particularly in the ink-painting which is the most characteristic kind of all. For painting to the Chinese is a branch of writing, the brush being used for both; and handwriting is for the connoisseur the most prized, the most intimately expressive, of all the arts. Specimens of writing by famous calligraphists are shown in the Exhibition; and if one turns from these to the ink-paintings of bamboos or plum branches, it is easy to feel the close affinity, and how the writer and painter alike seek to communicate life to every stroke of the brush. There must be no hesitation, no fumbling, no laborious correcting; the artist before he sets to work must have in his mind the perfect image of what he means to evoke with swift decisive strokes. Far more than in Europe,

Introduction

Chinese critics emphasise the need for the utmost mental concentration in the painter. Naturally this calligraphic element brings its dangers; it brings the temptation to give play to the ink-charged brush, to lose firm grip of reality in the forms depicted by indulging a love of swirling or sweeping movements or rich blots of black. Yet in the greatest masters we are astonished by the solidity with which mountain structure is built up by the use of conventions gradually formed and handed down, though the medium of ink and water-colours has so little of the inherent force and solidity of oils. So we have landscapes in which, as the Chinese say, one can wander, landscapes one can dwell in.

In figure-drawing we are impressed with the economy of means by which a mere contour can be made expressive of the form within. The cast shadow, that ready help in suggesting relief, is never used. Yet Chinese painting is rarely a flat pattern; the depth of space is sufficiently suggested.

And here we may note another feature of Chinese art, and that is the unique value it gives to empty spaces in design. These are not something left over; they have an integral, positive function. No other art uses this resource to the same degree or with so much felicity.

The Chinese are a literary nation; the scholar is honoured above all men. And Chinese art is intimately associated with literature, especially poetry. Associations with some well-known poem may give a sort of perfume to a picture. But painting is not literary in the bad sense of trying to express with form and colour what would be better expressed in words; the affinity with poetry is seen rather in the conception of picture-making. The painter, like the poet, finds a motive in Nature and communicates his own emotional response to it. And he relates the chosen forms to one another by bringing them into a rhythmical accord; he is not preoccupied with the representation of objects as such, still less with the complete realisation of a scene. The Chinese preference is for flowing rhythms, for sinuous lines like the movement of streams. In the later art this becomes a weakness, and cloy.

The great landscapes are often steeped in a poetic mood. The love of space and solitude is conspicuous. But while these are touched with a certain solemnity, there is apparent throughout Chinese art a gift for happiness; a humorous playfulness and gaiety will unexpectedly show themselves; and behind it all is a genial humanity.

An affinity with literature may be found also in that form of painting which is peculiar to China (though borrowed by Japan), the long horizontal scroll; for this is the common form of manuscripts. We are so accustomed to the framed picture that we may not appreciate at first this form, especially as to enjoy it rightly the picture must be gradually unrolled and a foot or two only contemplated at a time. But it is a delightful form; by this means one can not only wander through a vast tract of country in imagination, or follow the progress of a great river (as in the 'River of a Myriad Miles' by Hsia Kuei, lent to the Exhibition by the Chinese Government), one can also appreciate the succession of movements, contrasted yet continuous, the arrests and expansions, the range of tones from faint silver to deepest black, which have often prompted a comparison with the elaborate symphonies of Western music.

Introduction

The visitor to the Exhibition must not suppose that the array of pictures, or any array that could be assembled anywhere to-day, is representative of the whole of Chinese painting. Even pictures of the Sung period are rare; but of the period preceding it, the T'ang period (7th-10th centuries A.D.), almost nothing authentic has survived from the ravages of Time and from wholesale destruction. And yet the concurring testimony of critics and historians assures us that this was the grandest period of Chinese painting. It was the era of immense religious frescoes, to which, above all, Wu Tao-tzū, by common consent the greatest of the Chinese masters, devoted his genius. It was also the time in which landscape art was matured.

Of the Buddhist painting of this period we can form some conception from the early Japanese pictures, closely modelled on Chinese examples, and, in the case of the latter part of the period, from frescoes still existing at Tun-huang on the Western frontier, and from the numerous silk-paintings recovered from that site by Sir Aurel Stein and Professor Pelliot and now in the British Museum, in Delhi, and in Paris; but these are all more or less provincial in character. The British Museum has also the good fortune to possess the rarest of treasures, a painting that dates from an even earlier time than the T'ang period, a work of exquisite refinement and subtle vitality.

Of the art of the T'ang and earlier dynasties we can judge better from sculpture and ceramics than from painting. Sculpture in China has not the esteem it has in Europe. It was the work of artisans. It is mainly Buddhist. Animal motives rather than the human form inspired the more purely Chinese sculpture. Characteristic of the later Han period (1st and 2nd centuries A.D.) are low reliefs and incised slabs, remarkable for their sense of movement, depicting ceremonies, processions, combats, etc.

The Buddhist sculpture was founded, indirectly or directly, on Indian formula, modified by Chinese tendencies in design. It is extremely interesting to follow the gradual transformations of this Buddhist sculpture as the religion spread eastward over Asia. The images made at the beginning of the Christian era in Gandhara, outside the North-West frontier of India, were the work of Bactrian sculptors still preserving Hellenistic traditions. The Greek element persists in the cast of draperies, but the types become more and more Indianised. Then the art passes into China, and by the fifth century has become in all essentials the antithesis of Græco-Roman naturalism. The slender figures of the Wei dynasty (4th-6th centuries) are images in which the sculptor has no concern with actual human form and its proportions, but dissolves material into idea, concentrating his powers on the re-creation of the material into a form that shall be as expressive as possible of super-human serenity and compassion. Lines are prolonged in a stream-like flow, suggesting something infinite. The affinities of this art are with the statues on the Gothic cathedrals, not with classic sculpture.

With the T'ang dynasty, that era of the greatest expansion that the Chinese empire has known, when there was free communication between the East and West of Asia and with India, there comes a change. While the secular art, as we see from the pottery figures, recovered during the present century from tombs, was characterised by an extraordinary virility and a new robustness, Buddhist art was now directly influenced from India by the sculpture of the classic Gupta period. The images became grander and more massive. Numerous stone statues have survived. The bronze statues were mostly destroyed or melted down in the eighth century, during a brief phase of persecution of Buddhism.

When we speak of Chinese bronzes, however, we think not of Buddhist images, but rather of the ritual vessels which have survived from far remoter times. These impress by a force which seems as if actually indwelling in the powerful and massive forms, sometimes incorporating the shapes of animals or fabulous monsters, and communicating a sense of the terror and mystery in Nature. The bronzes may well be studied with profit by our metal-workers, as our potters have profited already by study of the earlier pottery. And it is, after all, in the ceramics that the plastic sense of the Chinese is most fully and variously manifested. Also, because of the comparative abundance of authentic material, this is the art in which the successive phases of Chinese taste and style can best be followed continuously through all the centuries of our era.

Just as the painters seem to have entered into the life of bird or flower or tree, so that they paint it, so to speak, from the inside, the potters enter into and assimilate the genius of their material; and the shapes that grow up under their hands—at least, in the great periods—appear to have acquired a destined form like fruit that swells to ripeness from within. The breadth and power of T'ang style, the reserve and purity of Sung, the coloured splendour of Ming, the dainty elegance of the later periods, each can be appreciated in turn; each is an index to the art of its time. Appealing to the senses alike of sight and touch, the finest of the bowls and vases see mat the same time to transcend the world of sense and to speak in some subtle and secret way to the emotions of the spirit.

Colour on silk. 64 by 28 cm.

*Dated in the seventeenth year of the reign of the T'ang Emperor K'ai Yüan (Hsüan Tsung, 713-56), which corresponds to A.D. 729. Recovered by Prof.
Paul Pelliot from the walled-up chamber at the Caves of the Thousand Buddhas, near Tun-huang, Chinese Turkestan. This is the earliest dated painting recovered from this site by Sir Aurel Stein or M. Pelliot*

UNKNOWN ARTIST; EARLY SUNG DYNASTY

'The Clerical Orgy'

Painting in colour on silk. Height 33 cm. Length 80 cm.

Lent by A. Stoclet, Brussels

Connected by Waley with Li Lung-mien; by Sirén with Yen Li-pên; in any case the painting possesses features of a T'ang or earlier picture. Probably after Chang Sêng-yu (6th century). See Waley, Introduction to the Study of Chinese Painting, pls. 34-36, and pp. 198-9. Sirén, History of Early Chinese Painting, p. 60

(detail on Pl. 66)

There is a curious resemblance between the principal group in this painting and a well-known sculpture found at Mathura in 1873 and now in the Museum there, cf. J. P. Vogel, Catalogue, 1910, p. 83 and F. S. Growse, Mathura and District Memoirs, 1880, pl. facing p. 156.

The subject has been identified by Vogel as the Buddhist God of Wealth, Kuvera. The date would be of the late Kushan period, about 5th century A.D. Not only the attitude and scanty dress of the bearded central figure, but the attitude and costume of the servants and the presence of children show striking parallels with M. Stoclet's painting.

Lent by the Chinese Government

One of a pair of paintings from the Imperial Palace collections. The other is reproduced by Sirén, History of Early Chinese Painting, vol. i, pl. 64. They are unsigned and painted in a style which cannot be paralleled in Chinese paintings known to us to-day. Both the gay colouring and the romantic treatment of the animals suggest a western, Iranian influence. The use of modelling also suggests a period when China was influenced from the west. In all probability they are copies, executed in the Northern Sung period, after T'ang originals.

For a detail of the painting reproduced on Pl. 68 see the coloured frontispiece.

A rough and vigorous drawing in the Stein collection at the British Museum (No. 168) was identified by Miss Chapin as the Buddhist patriarch Dharmatrata. Lent by the Honolulu Academy of Arts, Honolulu

The whole, except for two short pieces, in the middle and at the beginning, is reproduced, on a much reduced scale, by Sirén, History of Early Chinese Painting, vol. ii, pls. 17, 18.

No other work with Ma Fên's signature is known to survive, and an examination of the present painting reveals that this signature is probably a later addition. It is consequently impossible to say whether the painting is actually from the hand of Ma Fên, who was a precursor of the Ma school which flourished at Hangchow in the twelfth, and early thirteenth, centuries. It is more probably a work of this Southern Sung Academy school.
